God help us. Have none of you FCC people ever been in an airplane? The FCC should consider the comfort and safety of airline passengers and crew above the profits of telecommunications companies. Airplanes are one of the last bastions of peaceful public coexistance that cellphones have not yet and should never ruin. We are all of us sick and tired of our personal space being violated in public by oblivious cell phone junkies. The idea of sitting for 5 hours next to one of these rabid communicators makes me shudder. The FCC should also consider the safety of the flying public with regard to the explosion of air-rage that is likely to accompany permission to use cell phones during flight.
